

VILLA MAGDALENA

Miroslav Tichý (Kyjov, 1926-2011) withdrew to a life in isolation in his hometown of Kyjov, Moravia, Czech Republic after studying at the Academy of Fine Arts in Prague from 1945-1948. In the late 1950s he quitted painting and became a distinctive Diogenes-like figure. From the end of the 1960s he began to take photographs mainly of local women, in part with cameras he made by hand. He later mounted them on hand-made frames, added finishing touches with pencil, and thus moved them from photography in the direction of drawing. The result are works of strikingly unusual formal qualities, which disregard the rules of conventional photography. They constitute a large oeuvre of poetic, dreamlike views of feminine beauty in a small town under the Czechoslovak Communist régime.
